FIRST DEGREE INDICTMENT OF DORR IS ASKED

Lynn Police May Also Arrest Woman as Marsh Murder Accessory.

WANTS TO TALK WITH AUNT.

Stockton Police Will Use Dictagraph When Dorra Speaks with Relative.

A first degree indictment was returned against William A. Dorra of Stockton, Cal., by the grand jury at Newburyport, tomorrow, by Police Chief Burges of Lynn as the next step in the George E. Marsh murder case.

An indictment may be sought, too, against a woman on the ground that she is an accessory before the fact of the murder.

Up to yesterday Chief Burges thought Dorra alone was concerned with the killing of Marsh.

But certain developments today led him to consider the question whether a woman was aware of Dorra's plans when he came East.

The evidence which the police have accumulated against Dorra has been presented by Chief Burges to United Attorney Henry C. Atwell of Essex. The plan now is to have Inspectors Stanley Burges and William Thorpe of Lynn go before the Grand Jury tomorrow, with positively other witnesses.

Photographs of Dorra Arrive.

Chief Burges figures, for one thing, that it is much easier to get an indicted man extradited than one against whom merely a preliminary charge has been made.

The chief would like, if possible, to get before Governor Foss with indictment papers in his hand when he asks the Governor for an extradition request upon the Governor of California for Dorra.

Two photographs of Dorra, showing him at work in his store in Stockton, Cal., were received by Chief Burges yesterday from Chief Burges of Stockton. The Lynn police immediately prepared to show these pictures to Lynn people who have been quoted as saying they saw Dorra in Lynn of late.

Some of the people who will be asked if they can identify the pictures of Dorra include Mrs. Richard Leroy of No. 11 Parrott street, who is supposed to have let a room to Dorra; Mrs. Jennie Vore, proprietor of the Windsor apartments, where Dorra is said to have lodged just before the murder; F. G. Plummer of Boston, who sold a light suit to Dorra; and Mrs. M. J. Milroy of Lynn, who is said to have furnished information to the police.

Chief Burges may ask that Miss Ophelia Marsh, Dorra's aunt and sister of the murdered man, be brought to Lynn.

Arena's Big Bout Is Due This Week

Taft and T. R. Booked by Pilgrim A. C. Somebody'll Go Over the Ropes.

President Taft and Colonel Roosevelt will speak this week in this city in the Boston Arena building, the former on Thursday and the latter on Saturday evening, through the courtesy of the Pilgrim Athletic Association. There will be the last speeches of the two principal contenders of the Republican nomination for President before the Massachusetts presidential primaries on April 30.

The ring used by the athletic association will be moved to one end of the building and a large sounding board placed behind it, the ring being used for a speaking platform. Between 8,000 and 9,000 people can be accommodated and if either of the speakers wants to throw a hat or anything else in a real ring fight he can.

RUINS MAPLE SUGAR CROP.

QUENCH. April 20.—An ice jam has caused the Chandler river to overflow, with damage estimated at $250,000, in the region of Boston. The maple sugar crop, it is believed, will be ruined. The Federal and provincial governments will be asked to aid the food sufferers.

RILEY PRESCRIBES FOR A TIRED MAN

Maiden Justice, Without Looking at Mr. Manley's Tongue, Advises a Little Work.

ONE MONTH TO GET A JOB

Tale That the Respondent Was Once a Preacher; Weary Wife Complaining.

Richard B. Manley of Melrose, a retired clergyman in the prime of life, has "done so much work of late for ten years" and "needs much of his time in bed," according to what his wife told Judge Riley in Maiden District Court yesterday.

Judge Riley gave Manley one month to "get a job."

"If he doesn't land a job in that time the honor will give him 'something to do in the House of Correction.'"

Mrs. Manley had her husband summoned into Maiden District Court yesterday on a charge of non-support of herself and their six children, eldest aged thirteen.

Mr. Manley immediately pleaded guilty and Judge Riley asked Mrs. Manley to explain matters a bit. She took the stand and said:

"My husband has done no work to speak of for ten years. He has paid practically nothing toward my support or that of my children during that time. Recently he has been paying about $150 a week to my support. He spends much of his time in bed."

That was all the wife said, but Judge Riley asked for no more. He said to Manley:

"You look like an able-bodied man. I'll give you a month to get a job and take care of your family properly."

"If you don't get work in that time I'll give you something to do in the House of Correction."

The Manleys live at No. 25 Palmcroft street, Melrose, a comfortable appearing home. They moved to Melrose from Billerica about ten years ago. Manley had a pastorate near Billerica.

It is said that his health required outdoor work and that he took to selling life insurance, then books. He is of medium size, and, as Judge Riley said, seems able-bodied.

WANT TO BUY A RAILROAD?

Mellon Missed It and It's in New Hampshire.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., April 20.—Anybody want to buy a wrecked, bungled railroad? Now's your chance. The Portsmouth & Exeter street railroad is for sale. Just how this road has escaped Mr. Mellon no one seems to know—but it has. And what's more it won't be sold by soon. Tomorrow the road will shut up shop and go out of business.

It was the Portsmouth & Exeter road that it doesn't know where anybody lives and it hasn't been attractive enough to bring anybody to it. So the sheriff's got it and tomorrow at noon he'll knock it down to the highest bidder unless he's headed off before that.

VIOLET EDMANDS' SISTER IS A BRIDE

Miss Rose Married to the Rev. George Herbert Holt, of Barre, Vt.

PLANS UPSET BY TRAGEDY

Brookline Ceremony Recalls Betrothal of Clarence V. T. Richeson.

Miss Rose Edmonds, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Moses Grant Edmonds of Brookline, was married yesterday to the Rev. George Herbert Holt of Barre, Vt.

Tale wedding inevitably calls to mind a tragedy which shocked New England to its center last Fall and whose consequences have yet to run their course.

The bride of yesterday is the sister of Miss Violet Edmonds, who was the fiancée of Clarence V. T. Richeson.

After the short life of Avie Linnell was ended the events following seemed, as the startled public was soon to learn, the premonition of Richeson's complete reversal of Violet Edmonds' wedding plans, and a postponement of the wedding which was intended in the near future for Miss Rose Edmonds and Mr. Holt.

The Rev. George Herbert Holt was then occupying a pastorate in Jamaica, N. H. While his engagement to Miss Edmonds had been announced several months, no wedding date had been set, at least it had not been announced.

Tragedy Upset Plans.

But it was understood that shortly after Violet Edmonds was married the developments would become Mrs. Holt. The developments, however, which upset the whole current of the Edmonds family life, caused the wedding plans of Violet to be abandoned and those of Rose to be postponed.

Mr. Holt, meanwhile, had transferred to a pastorate at Barre, Vt. Plans for the wedding of Mr. Holt to the younger Miss Edmonds yesterday were made quietly. The ceremony was performed at the Moses Grant Edmonds home, 100 Brookline road, Brookline, shortly after the noon hour.

The family, relatives and a few friends were present.

The bride was sweet and girlish in a gown of white satin, draped with Spanish lace from her mother's wedding gown. The couple were married under a bower of cascading blossoms at the Church of the Rev. Maurice A. Levy of the First Baptist Church of Newton Centre.

The bride was attended by her cousin, Miss Gene Edmonds, of Charlestown Hill, who were point of departure for pink silk.

Coming Boston of Newton Centre was best man.

Violet Edmonds in Retirement.

Wedding breakfast followed. Then Mrs. Edmonds and her husband, the honeymoon trip. They will live in Barre, Vt.

The Rev. Maurice A. Levy of the First Baptist Church of Newton Centre, who officiated yesterday, was to have performed the marriage of Violet Edmonds to Clarence V. T. Richeson on January 5 last. On that date, however, Richeson was before the law, arrested in one of the most hideous charges ever laid against a man, cleric or layman.

About that time Miss Violet Edmonds left home. She has been reported at various places from time to time. It has been generally understood that she was seeking retirement, to restore her shattered nerves.

PICKPOCKETS ROB "FANS."

When Fans Jumped Up to Cheer Red Sox They Begun Work.

When "stove" Yerkies, the Red Sox second baseman, scored the winning run in the eleventh inning of the baseball game at Fenway Park yesterday two pickpockets also scored. C. D. Stevens of No. 298 Boston avenue, Everett, is an enthusiastic fan. When Yerkies crossed the plate Stevens rose up with other fans and howled. Someone—had Stevens wished he could lay hands on him—also rose up but made no "howl." Instead he quietly slipped a hand into Stevens' pocket and extracted therefrom a black leather pocket-book. The pocketbook contained $65 in bills and a couple of "stove" Yerkies had executed. Stevens reported his loss to the police. Shortly after Stevens reported his loss when Yerkies hit the home run, he was in a story of having his pocket picked at the same time. Stevens was this price contained $40.

Senate Investigators Plan to Summon All American Survivors of Titanic.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor Among Those Who Will Be Called Before Committee.

Stoker Asserts Liner's Men Fought Fire in Coal All the Way Across.

AS further facts come to light in connection with the great Titanic disaster, through the investigation by the Senate Sub-Committee and newspaper probing, two things stand out more and more conspicuously:

FIRST—The culpability of the White Star Steamship Company; and SECOND—The unparalleled chivalry of the men and the bravery of the women on board the doomed steamship.

The great, dominating facts of the sinking of the Titanic last Monday morning, two hours after midnight and a little longer than three hours after she had hit a great iceberg, have been related.

No story ever was told in in the newspapers of the world that stirred so many hearts and dimmed so many eyes with tears. Men and women who had no relatives on the Titanic have tried to get the horror of the midnight tragedy in the open sea out of their minds, but they have not been able to do it.

And they will not be able to do it for months, because all the elements that appeal to the human heart were there—where in the great realm of real life or in the world of fiction will you find anything more tragic, more dramatic, more heroic, more pathetic than the scene that took place in the North Atlantic amid the glistening icebergs and beneath the glinting stars?

In the interest of humanity this story will all be told again in more detail than it has yet. Senator Smith announced yesterday that all of the survivors of the disaster, including Mrs. John Jacob Astor, would be subpoenaed to appear before the Senate Investigating Committee. Then he adjourned the inquiry until tomorrow when it will meet in Washington.

But tears cannot bring back the victims that sleep down deep in the sea. Neither can the indignation against the company. Revised figures given out by the company say 1442 were lost of the 2147 persons that sailed.

But a like catastrophe may be averted by the government investigation that has started. Already facts have been brought out that have amazed the public and brought world-wide censure on the White Star Steamship Company.

CARRIED BOATS FOR ORNAMENT, NOT FOR USE

When the Titanic left the other side of the ocean on Wednesday, a week ago, the queen of the seas of the world, so far as size and luxury were concerned, she carried lifeboats, like the swimming tank, as a luxury, and not as a necessity. Little thought, if any, had been given to a possibility of their use.

The crew of the vessel, new to it because it was the first voyage, had not touched a lifeboat—had no concerted drill of any kind—had never given a moment's thought to the safety of passengers in case of accident.

And this was the situation as the big steamer cut through the sea, increasing her speed from day to day until she was running at the highest speed of her first trip when they struck the field of icebergs.

Everybody on the Titanic knew about the icebergs—Captain Smith, J. Bruce Ismay, one of the principal owners of the ship, all the passengers. But the Titanic did not change her course an iota, nor lessen her speed. It is declared Captain Smith, in evening clothes, dined the fatal Sunday evening with Ismay, when the ship was on the border of the ice.

Major Arthur Puehchen, of the Queen's Rifles, of Toronto, who was a passenger on the Titanic, declared Mrs. Ryerson of Philadelphia, who lost her husband and son in the disaster, told him this:

"Late Sunday afternoon, while the Titanic was going along at a fast rate, I went to Mr. Ismay and said:

"OH, MR. ISMAY, I HAVE HEARD THAT THE WIRELESS HAS REPORTED A LARGE NUMBER OF ICEBERGS IN THE PATH OF OUR SHIP. ARE YOU NOT GOING TO ORDER HER TO SLOW DOWN?"

"HE REPLIED: 'ON THE CONTRARY, MRS. RYERSON, WE ARE GOING TO GO ALONG FASTER THAN WE HAVE BEEN GOING, AND WE DID GO FASTER.'"

ROOSEVELT FALSE TO HIS IDEALS, SAYS LONG

Former Governor Says President's Rival "Can Talk All Day."

"If you elect Roosevelt for a third term you will have to take to the streets of this city," said John H. Long, former secretary of the Navy, at the Fall rally held at Faneuil Hall yesterday. "I am not a politician, but I am a citizen, and I am going to express my opinion as to the man who is to be elected President."

"Roosevelt is a man who has no backbone," said Long. "He is a man who is afraid to stand up for his principles. He is a man who is afraid to stand up for the people. He is a man who is afraid to stand up for the country."

If You Mean to Pay 25.00 for Your New Suit

You naturally want to make your selection from the Newest and the Biggest Stocks—and those of which the intrinsic values are highest.

The Filene 25.00 Suit stock possesses the above requisites in a most complete way.

At 25.00 there are many individual points of excellence in Cut, Fit, Finish, etc., which one has to see in order to appreciate.

At 25.00 there are over 100 suits for selection.

At 25.00 nearly 100 styles, and changed almost constantly, so that not very many of a style are produced.

At 25.00 special designers are all the time working to improve this particular line.

At 25.00 many of the materials are bought by us direct from the mill (that means just so much more value for 25.00).

At 25.00 every suit to go into this group is very carefully appraised as to value (it has to win its way).

At 25.00 sizes and combinations of measurements are so distributed as to lessen the probable need of alterations.

At 18.50 to 190.00 are models in Satins, Silks, Charmeuse, Whipcord, Linen, White Serge, etc., New Trimmings, New Revers, New Sleeves; Imported Model Suits, many single models not to be duplicated.

Doublet Blouse Belts

Belts both plain and fancy as accessories to dress are fast coming into favor; the style of dress now in fashion—the doublet effect—making belts almost imperative. Big varieties at Filene's. Among them:

Yarns of all Belts, with inserts of contrasting colors, $1.95.
2 1/2 inch wide Belts, 1 inch to 2 1/2 inch long, $1.00.
Belts in black and white, $1.00.
Single Belts, 1 1/2 inch, at 50c.

Hand embroidered neckties, $1.00.
Silk ties, $1.00.
Lace trimmed lawn ties, $1.00.
Lace trimmed lawn ties, $1.00.

A New Method for Cleaning Furs At No Extra Charge

An added advantage of Filene Cold Storage this year is that all Furs are cleaned by BLOWN AIR—an improvement over whipping, as there is no danger of "matting" or breaking hairs or buttons, or of tearing the garments.

All Furs should now be in Cold Storage. SPRING SUNSHINE (or heat indoors) is a danger to your Furs, because it dries up the oils. Our Dry Cold Air Storage protects your furs against MOTHS which with warm weather will begin to reanimate, and the danger of FIRE or ACCIDENTS.

Telephone or write, giving list of Furs, and messenger will call.

Charges 3% with reasonable minimum—No extra charge for BLOWN-AIR CLEANING.

Diamond TIRES

THOUGH there are more Diamond Tires sold than any other single brand, your tire repair man will tell you that he repairs fewer Diamonds than any other tire.

He'll tell you too that a patch will stick on a Diamond Tire, that a cut or smash that would ruin any other tire can be repaired in a Diamond.

Not only is the Diamond tire the best and cheapest to repair, but it also gives you the longest mileage as the Diamond Tire does.

Made of Real Rubber with White Tough Tread

GOODRICH TIRES

Goodrich—the Original American Clincher—started right 15 years ago, by adopting and perfecting the integral Molded Construction. Tires "built as a unit, cured as a unit" proved greatest in strength, cohesion, mileage service, then, as now.

Today, the strongest adherents of other methods are turning to the molded process. They know now it is the best way to make a good automobile tire.

We did the experimenting long ago—and offer users a two-fold benefit:—

Sound construction to begin with and more than a decade of improvements—including the inimitable White Tough Tread

Goodrich Tires are made in all styles, to fit all rims, and to suit all purposes.

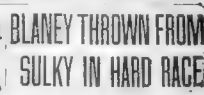

There has never been a season when the direct, unforged demand for these tires did not exceed by thousands the utmost capacity of our factories. The issue has been met this year by a tremendously increased capacity which will enable us to care for both dealers and users to the fullest extent.

Now is the time to decide. Will it be good value?—organized service?—a square deal? or—just tires?

Don't Look for an Opening Make One

BY HERBERT KAUFMAN

Don't look for an opening. Make one. Its size is unimportant. If you are "built for the job" you'll quickly enough enlarge your opportunity. An eagle in a wedge in. The "big chance" comes to you. It exists everywhere and ever. It lies between a step and the ground. It does not matter how small it is, but what you are. True ambition will push you with them to the goal. Real determination simply demands something to gain.

You cannot rest yourself at all. There is a great deal of a path to follow. Do not travel by a. But when you are done, to others, it must be, but step by step, and by way.

Success requires persistence coupled with rest.

You must be persistent and consistent, concentrate your energies and stick to your last to the last.

You can't do more than one thing at a time and do anything.

Professions, pursuits and businesses share this characteristic, so-called as well as whole, but attention.

Standards of perfection are never perfect, but they are.

You cannot raise yourself with a mark.

Believe in yourself, but believe in the. You can have them, you have bad habits. Strip before battle. Once in the light you must move fast. Your advancement will be in proportion to the diligence and desire are constantly tugging you backward.

Until you have conquered caprice you are neither fit nor fitted to master hardship.

Triumph is the sole right of the competent. Only a few may lead, and none of us prefer inferiority. Competition is the way that establishes grades.

You cannot be helped even if influence does lift you above the masses. The moment you assume responsibility, however, your capability you will be crushed down to your real place. You won't maintain what you don't sustain.

Even in the days of special privilege, extraordinary men extend their power and by force of individuality shouldered through more beginning, stood revealed.

Ground that society is a bigot—incredulous, harsh and uncharitable—still in the end humanity has always paid due tribute to indubitable worth.

The hour is always ripe for a Bonaparte, a Wellington, a Marlborough.

No barriers can thwart a Galileo, a Watt, a Harvey or a Lister. A T. Stewart would have been a prince in any country and in any country.

Accident has played the part of a history of achievement. Every forehead which has been backed in glory was first bathed in sweat.

We will always give you a show, but not the whole show. You must earn that and you can—nothing can resist human will at full tilt.

1. The first step is to identify the main components of the system. This includes the hardware (CPU, memory, storage) and software (operating system, applications).

2. Next, we need to understand the data flow and how the components interact. This involves creating a data flow diagram (DFD) or a similar model.

3. Once the components and their interactions are understood, we can begin to design the system architecture. This includes deciding on the overall structure, the roles of different components, and the data structures used.

4. The next step is to implement the design. This involves writing the code, configuring the hardware, and testing the system.

5. Finally, we need to maintain and update the system. This includes monitoring performance, fixing bugs, and adding new features as needed.

"I'm in a dilemma! I want the judgment of a man of the world!"

No. 3. A Quiet Afternoon

"O H, how do you do, Mr. Strong? I'm so glad to see you! I was just saying to myself it's such a dull afternoon I'd be glad to see anybody."

"Even me?"

"Now, you're just seeking for a compliment, but you won't get it. Sit down in that big easy chair and we'll have a nice, quiet, comfy afternoon, and you can talk to me."

"I can do what?"

"Oh, well, I'll talk to you then. I want to ask your advice about something. I'm in a—well, a sort of a dilemma—and I want the judgment of a man of the world—an all-round knowing man—if you know what I mean. Oh, there's the telephone—pardon me, Mr. Strong—I'll just see who it is—no, you needn't leave the room—it's probably Tottie, or some of the girls. Hello! Oh, hello! Is that you, Jack? Why, you dear boy, I'm so glad to see you—hear you, I mean."

"What? Not really? Oh, the idea! Now, don't you flatter me like that—oh, no, no—I couldn't possibly—well, maybe—if you'll promise to be good."

"What now? Oh, no, Jack, you can't come up here now. I'm just going out! No—you didn't hear a man's voice exclaiming? That was Ed! Yes, he has a human sort of a bark. Well, yes, it is a little like Willy Willing's voice—he's a perfect puppy! What! Not of course, I mean Ed. No, Jack, you can't come now; I tell you I'm going out. I have oh my hat and coat already—yes, that was Ed again—he always makes that queer sound when anybody telephones. (Puts hand over transmitter.) Mr. Strong, you must keep still, or I won't tell all these for your benefit! But I don't want our nice quiet afternoon intruded upon—Yes, Jack, come to-morrow. I have something I want to consult you about. I really need the advice of a (covers transmitter again)—Mr. Strong, please step into the library for a moment. Look at the new books on the table—Yes, Jack, truly, I need the experienced advice of an all-round man of the world—like you—oh, yes, you are—very carefully well-balanced and all that—don't talk when I'm talking—wait till I ring off—oh, Jane is just bringing me a card—wait a minute, Jack—why, it's Mr. Strong—I like that man awfully well—show him in, Jane. Goodby, Jack—no, I can't listen now—goodby."

"How do you do, Mr. Strong? Do sit down. Take this easy chair. I'm so glad to see you—yes, isn't it dull weather? So good of you to come and brighten up an otherwise lonely afternoon. Excuse me, just a moment; there's a new book in the library I want to show you. (Goes into next room.)"

"Now, Mr. Strong, you must stay here till Mr.

Strong goes. Because, if you show yourself, you'll have to leave here before he does—"

"I won't!"

"Hush, he'll hear you—now, I won't be a bit entertaining to him, and he'll soon go—and then we can have our nice, quiet afternoon. Now, will you be good—boy and stay here and not make a sound?"

"Yes, but I'll eavesdrop everything you say."

"I don't care. I shan't mean a word of it!"

"And if you don't fire him pretty swift I'll come in there and stir up a hurrah's end!"

"There! there! there! little one. Rest tranquil! Read a nice, pretty book or something. But don't smoke, or he'll know somebody's in here."

(Lilly returns to drawing room.) "Yes, I'm so glad you came, Mr. Strong—what book?—Oh, yes, I was going to show you a book, but I—It wasn't there. Never mind, let's just chat—I want to ask you something, something serious, you know. May I?"

"Oh—I don't know—you see, it's Leap Year!"

"Now, Mr. Strong, don't be frivolous. It doesn't suit your iron-bound countenance. And truly, I'm in earnest! You know, we women like to get the ideas of a man's brain! A man of judgment and experience—well, what they call a man of the world—oh, yes, you are. I often quote your opinions—they're so profound. Now, what I want to ask you about is—oh, there's the telephone—excuse me—just a tiny minute—no, don't go. Oh, Hello! Is that you, Flossy? Darling girl, do come over, can't you?—yes, now—right away—oh, I wish you could—I want to hear all about it!—only last night—a ruby and diamond—oh, heavenly!—well, come to-morrow morning, then—yes—yes, indeed, dearest—goodby—goodby—yes, I think so, too—perfectly horrid, but, oh, of course, yes—goodby—no, nothing of the sort—yes, I'll come right over—goodby—"

"Oh, must you go, Mr. Strong?"

"Well, yes, I did tell Miss Fay I'd go over to see her, but I meant after your call was over—please don't go yet—you must! Well, come again, do—I always enjoy a talk with you—you're so—so profound—if you know what I mean. Good afternoon, Mr. Strong."

"Now, come back, Mr. Strong! Didn't I tell you I'd get rid of him in short order? But he's such an everlasting talker! It's hard to make him go. Now, we can have our nice, quiet afternoon. Excuse me just a minute first—I want to telephone just the latest word to Tottie May!"

"Oh, hello! Is this you, darling? What do you think?"

"Oh, you know already? Did Flossy tell you?—oh, no, not really! Well, for gracious goodness' sake!—yes, coral-pink chiffon, in one of those new smudge designs—oh, yes—a black chip Calababrough, with practically all the feathers in the world piled on it—no, Thursday afternoon—why, about five—violet! Well, rasher! Oh, Tottie—and, yes, Mr. Strong is here, but he can't hear what you say—no, he doesn't mind wait—" ing—oh, Tottie! I can't believe it! Yes, she did! And she said that Billy said if she ever did such a thing again—Oh, Tottie, what do you think? Mr. Strong has gone!"

"Is this you, darling?"

"Oh, Tottie, what do you think? Mr. Strong has gone!"

Some New Discoveries About Deadly POISONS

In the State of the University of Berlin, has recently been used as a preservative which appears to show almost insuperable powers of resistance. (See Zoologische Anzeiger, vol. xxi, p. 69.) A student at the University of Berlin, who had been sent by his father to the Cape of Good Hope, collected the heads sent him from German South-West Africa. The heads were placed in tin boxes, covered with a solution of formaldehyde to preserve them, and they "now sealed." When these boxes were opened, after a great lapse of time, the flies flew out, and the heads seemed as ordinary "fruit fly" which was about over-ripe bananas and grapes (apple, strawberry, etc.). It is interesting to note more especially the fact that great numbers of the same were found swimming about in the preserving liquid.

Fearing that the heads would be injured by the use of a saturated solution of formaldehyde was tried over the heads, but the larvae are uninjured. No doubt the same result will be obtained in other cases known. It is very largely used to disinfect rooms where there have been contagious diseases.

The occurrence of plants which live upon insects which they capture is well known. Some of these plants have appendages which act as traps. The lid of the trap lies open, but when an insect walks in the lid of the dancer line the lid snaps shut and the plant digests its prey. When the digestion is complete, the trap opens for another victim. There are five species of Drosera, however (2 caudata, 1 phloides, and 1 rotundifolia), which lay their eyes in the digestive fluid of the pitcher plants, and the larvae live on the insects on the plants. The plants are not digested because they secrete a fluid which renders the digestive fluid harmless to them. The same worms and other intestinal worms have the same means of stopping digestive processes.

It is a common report that the Dead Sea in Palestine and the Great Salt Lake in Utah contain no animal life because of the great amount of dissolved matter in the water. But in Southern California there is a lake, Owen's Lake, which contains as much dissolved material as either the Dead Sea or Great Salt Lake, and in addition to this the water contains soda (washing soda). Each gallon of this water contains nearly a pound and a half of washing soda, and large quantities of the water are evaporated in order to obtain this soda. Contrary to all expectations, this lake contains an abundance of animal life, but all of

Is there any hope for the baldheaded man? Not if he has too much faith in fakes.

Ordinary baldness—the common or front receding kind—is the result of a lack of care. The average man commences to lose his head hair about the age of 30.

There are many men who begin to notice the loss of hair at an early age. This is due to the absence of a vitamin, is generally an inherited predisposition and a man's father or grandfather became bald early in life. It is usually only this trait himself. But here is a way to stop the loss of hair.

It is to arrive in life before thirty years of age—before your scalp absolutely clean. Remember that the dirt which collects on the scalp will cause new roots of hair to fall out. If you do not clean your scalp, the hair will disappear, and if the scalp is properly treated, the hair will grow again.

When this is accomplished, you can stimulate the glands around the roots that they will be nourished and generate new hair.

What will do this? After cleansing the scalp with a pure soap, rub into it a little of mercury,  $\text{Hg}$ , or a little iodine,  $\text{I}$ , and distilled water, each two ounces of each, and apply daily. It will take two months to grow the hair, it is in a little longer.

But remember, that gradual loss of the hair is not Upon that statement of facts, finding it in favor of the innocent's estate, the company took the case to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court. There, the decision of the lower court was affirmed by the cost of last resort, the Company, with the result that it was foreclosed.

In due time the case, Judge Irving presiding on the Court of Appeals, writing the dissenting opinion, in which he held that the innocent's estate was the famous man had forsaken it for their behalf for others of their kind.

Florence Schenck BEFORE Running Away with Alfred Vanderbilt's Horse Trainer, Wilson.

"The arm of retribution is long, and even now it may be stretching out to grip Floretta Whaley and her innocent little babies, whose father is Rev. Jere Cooke, the minister who betrayed his vows, his church and his wife to run away with the little Hempstead heiress."

And again, there was Mrs. Antonio Ruiz, wife of a member of the Cuban Legion at Washington, whom he divorced, and who killed herself in her London apartment after Alfred Guyane Vanderbilt had ceased calling upon her. Was Floretta Whaley a victim?

There is no doubt that the arm of retribution is long, and even now it may be stretching out to grip Floretta Whaley and her innocent little babies, whose father is Rev. Jere Cooke, the minister who betrayed his vows, his church and his wife to run away with the little Hempstead heiress."

Why Children are Made Brighter BY ELECTRIFYING THEM

Scientists Explain the Benefits and Dangers of Professor Arrhenius' Discovery That the Development of Children May Be Hastened by Electricity.

THE cable has brought the astonishing news that Professor Svante Arrhenius, the famous Swedish scientist, has doubled the growth of school children by electrical treatment. He doubled their growth just as the growth of bean-bearing plants had been increased by the same means.

There is a danger, too, of the increased growth of algae. The fact that the light frequency spectrum employed hastens the process of photosynthesis (oxidation) is the process by which the water produces the oxygen we breathe up. Without oxidation we should die quickly of poison. With perfect oxygenation our present length of life would be doubled, perhaps tripled. The light frequency current carries oxygen into the lungs.

It is reasonable to expect that a process which improves health would accelerate growth rate and thus the final forces which produce growth would with perfect oxidation enjoy an unchecked course.

But there is a possibility that hastening the growth may diminish the vitality of the blood especially if this growth is carried on beyond the biophotic natural rate. Some observations on the growth of Staphylococcus aureus by electrolysis showed a significant increase in the number of cells after 10 days of electrolysis, but a definite decrease in vitality with much less growth.

The Archenius discovery follows upon a series of allelic experiments recently made on plants. It has been proved that if an electric current is passed through the soil surrounding the roots of a plant and through the air above the plant its growth will be materially accelerated and the size of the product greatly increased. Professor Archenius has now shown that exactly the same effects can be produced on bacteria.

This experiment was tried on a class of school children who for a period of six months occupied a room in which an electrical apparatus generating the alternating current of very high frequency had been installed. The children were quite unaware that they were being experimented upon, and although the powerful currents were being conducted to the switch through them, experienced no sensation. An adjoining room not so equipped was occupied by another class of children of approximately the same ages, weight and height and mental attainments.

At the commencement of the experiment, each child in both rooms was weighed and measured and subjected to various tests calculated to reveal its exact physical condition, while carefully devised mental tests brought out the necessary data regarding the children's mental status.

At the end of the test period all the children were put through similar tests, and a comparison of the two records showed that the children who had been subjected to the electric wave treatment

Dr. William James Morton, the originator of high speed currents and for twenty years professor of electrotherapy in the New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital, discussed and explained Professor Arrhenius' experiments in an interview with a representative of this newspaper.

“We have been using high frequency currents for a long time to cure sick fish,” he said, “but Professor Arrhenius’ experiments would indicate that they may now be used with even greater advantage in health.”

"The time will come, I believe, when not only the school-room, the hospital and the sanitarium will be equipped with high frequency current apparatus, but that every private dwelling will be so provided. The use of high frequency current is considered an indispensable feature of the home as the bathroom is to-day. Men will resort to it to read their morning papers, underlining the wonderful life-giving current for use on the face, and going down to the women folk and to children will spend the best part of the day under the same beautiful conditions. Sickness will be to a great extent eliminated, and the term of human life prolonged. The human race of the future may live to be over a hundred with ease."

Emile Bachelet the inventor of an apparatus for utilizing waste steam from power stations, and a French engineer, for the State of Washington, on the other hand, was inclined to minimize the importance of Arrhenius's discovery.

"I have little to say about such plants," he said, "and I never found that their metabolism was different from the plant grown farther away; it was more like the plants close at hand, and had no relations."

That is probably a source of Arrhenius's electrically neutral and a priori. The fact is you can't beat nature. You may make a candle burn lighter by supplying oxygen to it, but it will be consumed.

For this reason I doubt whether there is much to be gained in making normal school children grow faster. A giant's size is of little avail without a giant's strength.

"With abnormal children, however, the principle applied by Arrhenius may be of great value. I refer to those children in whom normal physical growth is retarded by constitutional defects. There, the electric current may provide the necessary stimulus to overcome the difficulty and the child may be brought up to a normal condition."

Although scientific men differ so much on the importance of Arrhenius's experiment, they are agreed upon the manner in which it operates.

Now Professor Svante Arrhenius subjected a class of school children to powerful, but imperceptible, high-frequency, alternating electric currents to make them bigger and brighter. The experiment covered a period of six months and at the end of that time it was found that the development of these children was just twice that of the children in an adjoining classroom not so equipped. Here the electricity is shown passing through the school room and the children from the apparatus behind the walls.

Invisible magnetic lines of force generated by an alternating current are here passing through the child, who experiences no sensation, and is unaware that she is being treated. This apparatus, invented by Emile Bachelet, has been used for many years in the treatment of various diseases.

How Professor Arrhenius was able to perform his experiment without the knowledge of the children is illustrated in this picture, which shows the Bachelet apparatus operating in a similar manner through walls.

MADAME GUINAN was the wealthy widow of Jean Howard, a French financier and president of the Bank of France. Madame Guinan was seventy years old. One night she took a train at Fontenay-lez Paris. She occupied a first-class compartment, and assumed that no one else should be seated in it.

When the train arrived in Paris the porters found her compartment unoccupied. The door had been half torn from its hinges. There was a great pool of blood on the floor, and the floor plates were soiled with blood. The door was torn at a top piece of split and a first-class railroad ticket from Fontenay-lez Paris to Paris.

A search along the railroad tracks resulted in the finding of Miss Guinan's body beside the rails just outside Fontenay-lez Paris. It was clearly evident that she was found on the tracks after she had left the train. It was a few days before she could be found. There were no prints on her fingers and no money in her pockets. The police were unable to find any of the Guinan relatives took the ground that she had been seized with a hemorrhage in which she was sufficed, but failed to reach the door of the train. The police were unable to get any further. The body was found in the door open and had been torn from the door. The body was found in the door open and had been torn from the door. "Afterwards," says the article, "I did not like to tell you that I was going to the court and met with Mme. Guan at her home." After he had finished his investigations, he went to M. Lape, Prefect of Paris, and said to him:

"I am convinced that this is neither a case of accident nor suicide. I am sure that Mme. Guan was murdered, and I am equally sure that her murderer was a soldier. Can you not discover whether there were any soldiers on the Fontainebleau trails that night?"

"Why are you so sure that this was not an accident?" asked M. Lape.

"Because," said the reporter, "Guan's family is convinced that she fell from the trail during the throes of a hemorrhage."

"Because there are two irrefutable signs of murder," said Prefect Lape. "In the first place, the towel there was a towel and stationary wastaband. In the course of our examination we were trying in the light of the fact that this towel was not an old state upon it visible to the naked eye. Nevertheless, we subjected every square inch to one of the most delicate tests for blood. We have discovered an area which gave us the positive reaction for human blood."

"Upon this towel the murderer of Mme. Guan wiped his ATTY BRENNER was a pretty little mustache had ginger hair and a little of the color of his hair. She was a good, quiet, with ambitions toward grand opera. Two nights a week she stayed away from the cafe, kept to her apartment and studied. She had a few friends, but no one like Koenig Strauss kept by a widow in the Kilmoryn.

On the night of December 12—1931 in a bookish house that was a little like the one in which she lived, she was as usual. She made her way upstairs and then paused, thinking that she had better go down and see if the door was not downstairs again. The door to the street was unlocked.

A search through the houses showed that nothing had been disturbed. She went back to her room and looked at Kraenken's mind. With other tenants she went to Fraulein Strauss's room and knocked loudly. Getting no answer, she broke in the door.

There on the bed lay the singer. There were marks, turning black, of blood on the floor. She saw a pool of blood against her body was bare. From an incision in the upper part of the right arm, blood was flowing. She saw the upper part of the head and the floor boards it. There was a mass of chloroform in the room. Beyond that nothing—no sign of struggle, nothing.

The police came and, recognizing one of those peculiar cases, they took the body to the morgue. It was a very famous German expert, Dr. Gross made a minute examination of the room. The incision in Fraulein Brenner's arm had been made deep enough to reach the bone. The body was not, but only into insensibility. Death had come from loss of blood. One of the windows was open. The door was tight in it. There were several long black bars. Beside the bed, Dr. Gross found a small fragment of sponge, still anointed of chloroform. On a shelf in the room, he found a number of pieces of thin glass, covered with blood.

The next morning Dr. Gross called upon the head of the Berlin police.

"The murderer of Fraulein Brenner," he said, "is a physician who has been arrested at the scene of the crime."

five feet eleven inches tall, is thin and has a black beard three inches long. The first and middle fingers of his right hand have the second and third joints missing. He has a further peculiarity of being three-quarters of an inch longer than his third finger. He has a habit of holding his hands in metal clasps on the heels. His arms are short for his height; they are two feet eight inches from shoulder to elbow. He is a native of the Congo and is called the Sleeping Sickness. He has a deep cut in the upper part of his left arm. He is a murderer.

"The Sleeping Sickness," continued Dr. Gross, "is, as you perhaps know, one of the most terrible and mysterious of diseases. It is caused by a germ called the trypanosome, a small spindle-shaped microbe with a long whip-like tail. "Which enables it to move about in the blood with astonishing rapidity. The germs are communicated by flies."

"While it is called by the natives of the Congo the Sleeping Sickness, that is, the sickness which causes one to call death "sleep," and when they say sleeping sickness they really mean death sickness. The victim indeed suffers apparently from insomnia and a common symptom is disturbance of the sight and hallucinations. Another peculiarity is the intense itching of the skin, which causes the shaking hands he is sporting."

"Now," the witch doctors of the Congo believe a "cure" as terrible as the disease. They administer to the sufferer will drink great quantities of untaimed human blood, preferably that of a white man. It is said that the victims of this cure may atone crimes result from this superstitious, but the "cure" is simply out of the reach of all and but a few of the natives.

"You saw me pick up some bloodstained fragments of glass. I recognized them in my laboratory as parts of a broken bottle, the little bottle of blood from a good friend. My microscopic tests of the blood upon these fragments revealed to me the presence of the germs of the Sleeping Sickness. Whence did they come? Clearly not from the man. The tests showed her blood to be perfectly healthy. Manifestly, then, these terms must have had as root the murder."

woman, and meeting unexpected resistance, fought with her. She was killed, and the body of the woman found on the register, and then stripped the body of its jewels. He knew that this would be evidence of the practice of anonymous give in the compartment, and already a plan was forming in his mind to make the affair appear to have been an accident. He washes the body with soap and water—but does not know that we can discover blood even when it is only to the amount of 3-4000 huiiteters.

He then pretends compartment door open, leaving it nearly closed by his liners as he does so. The train is stopped. He is pressed for time, rips open the satchel with his knife, and finds the woman's jewels. He jumps out of the train between Fontainebleau and Paris, he jumps from the car, and makes his escape."

Result of Professor Reiss's analysis, it was found that two soldiers, Gravy and Alchelt, had followed him. They saw the train crash, and saw the woman's body hidden in her compartment, and when the train had started they murdered her, as Professor Reiss has indicated. The two soldiers were taken to the trial at the trial of these two men. They both confessed, were convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment.

I infer the leuath of the hair of the head was different from the hair of the hand where the hand will get the best hold. This would naturally be the thickest part of the beard, which is also the longest. Dr. Brown says the hair of the head is about half an inch longer than the hair of the hand, and the hairs all approximately the same length and carefully trimmed. This is an identifying peculiarity of the assure beard. The hair of the head was about four inches long.

"The other measurements are a wavier of exact formulae, and a body of certain positions must have left definite markings which do not apply to any other position. The carpet in the Fraulein's room had a heavy nap, except the fringe. I detected the marks of the murderer's feet when he first leaned over and gripped her throat. Twelve to fifteen deeper marks where his feet had dug in to get under the body of the woman. I measured the marks. I got the measurements of the shoes. There were also marks of the heel of the shoe on the floor, and the heels. In the Jertillon gallery is a collection of such prints.

"I calculate the angles from these foot marks to the bed. I get down the exact position of the murderer while throwing. I calculate the angles between the bands while gripping the throat. I get the exact position of the murderer this way I arrive at the exact length of arms and the exact height of the man. I know he is this because that is a fact.

"Within a few hours the police arrested a Dr. Franz Meckelstadt, a physician recently returned from the Congo. He had been in the Congo for about a year. His measurements were exactly as Dr. Groen had indicated. The doctor was a tall, thin man, with a long neck, the height of an inch longer than the third. He was suffering from sleeping sickness and was insane upon one point—the idea of the length of the arms and the height of the man. He calmly confessed to the murder of Fraulein Brauner, repeatedly expressing the reconstruction of Dr. Groen.

"I had the doctor taken to the hospital in a hospital of the head he had contracted in the Congo.

The diagraph is. The diagraph is a very wonderful new, invented instrument that has the power of collecting all the sounds in a room where it is placed, of transmitting them by wire as fast as 50 miles, and of pouring them out at the other end in a volume anywhere from a whisper that you have to lean over and transmit up to your ear as loud as a shout that you can hear. It focuses the normal volume of the voice, when in essay.

Its principle is the same as that of the telephone, only its sound gathering power is many many times greater. You have to talk into the receiver of a telephone. When the diagraph is in a room it can send, even by the telephone, as fast as 50 miles, all of the sounds in the room and catch

AT this season through sudden change of weather, or through unwisely dressing in too light weight clothing, the person who has triumphantly avoided contracting a cold during the Winter months acquires what may develop into a tremendously annoying or worse, Summer cold.

'Cold plunge baths harden the skin and help to make one immune from colds.'

DON'T acquire that protracted unpleasantness, a Summer cold.

To best understand how to prevent a cold, let us perfectly understand its causes. I say causes, not causes for an authority on the subject has recently said that there are four conditions that bring about the annoying and dangerous condition we call "a cold."

There must be lowered vitality. In other words, a person may be in that state we describe as "run down." When we are run down or "sleazy," as they say in England, our resistance to disease is lowered. It is like a besieged town whose walls are falling. In this unprotected state we have little chance against a cold.

A similar condition is fatigue. We are more prone to catch cold when we are tired because the good white blood cells, the body's natural defenders, are lessened by weariness. Also fatigue creates an excess of certain gases in the body, carbonic acid was among others, and the self-poisons weaken the body and open the doors to cold.

So, to keep your vitality high and keep your liver active. If it becomes lazy, take plenty of exercise to stir it into activity.

But be not satisfied with avoiding stagnant blood. Avoid stagnant air. Keep the air circulating in the room you occupy. Try to keep a stream of fresh air flowing through your room. At any rate, keep the window open two or three inches at the top, no matter what the weather.

Gold plunges or shower or sponge bath, and rub the skin and help to make you immune from colds, but before beginning to take them ask a physician's advice. You may not have enough vitality to endure the ordeal. If you have your physician's "O. K.," the best time to begin is in the Summer.

Avoid coughing when you can, for coughing is sometimes merely a reflex. A bad cold, however, which irritates the lining of the throat.

The old-fashioned remedy for a cold, of swallowing a mixture of equal parts of vinegar and molasses, is as good now as it was when our grandmothers dosed us plentifully and effectually for hoarseness. A pleasant and more refined remedy is the plentiful use of honey. Use it freely on bread or with rice at tea; and swallow a tablespoonful of it whenever between meals you feel the tickling sensation that precedes coughing.

Gargling with strong salt water

Mme. Lina Cavalieri.

A good method, and a simple one of relief from violent coughing is to place upon the chest hot cloths, followed by cold ones, then hot, then cold, so alternating many times. This re-establishes natural circulation and restored circulation means relief from cold.

Beauty Questions Answered

See a physician. Your vitality is doubtless lowered.
If H. K. asks me to publish a formula for a good shampoo, also for the hair, I will say:
Please make a good shampoo:
Water, one cupful.
One egg.
Tincture of green soap, 1 teaspoonful.
Mix thoroughly, 1 teaspoonful.
Mix thoroughly and rub well into the scalp.
I strongly disapprove of liquid shampoos. It usually contains much or some other substance that clogs the pores.
If B. asks "a remedy for skin warts and blemishes. Also, can I live the front and sides of my hair grow to match the rest of my back hair?
My hair is turning gray in places though I am not yet thirty."

Horseback riding is one of the exercises that has the effect of reducing the size of the hips and waist. Rolling is another, but wieners are not rolling your arms out from injury by crossing your arms upon it.

A simple and harmless hair dye is made by boiling potatoes. The folks in the water in which potatoes have been boiled. Vienna sausage, prepared in the same way, is also good for the hair. But you must have secured the right shade. But I would advise stimulating the hair by massaging the scalp every day and using a hairbrush.

C. L. frankly confessing that he is of the alleged superior sex, asks: "What can I do to remove some of the fat from my neck?" He has two tweezers, and dear C. L. he pursues his inquiries thus: "What can I do for my nose, which is the tip?" My good friend, pinch it.

Now Mrs Frank Gould, the former Gaiety Girl. Disappointed in her American Social Ambitions.
Will learn English Fashion
from a Farmer's Farm Right Near the Duchesse of Manchester

MRS. FRANK GOULD has given up her efforts to win over the Gould family and New York society. With her pearls, her beauty and her sister she has decided to attack the Smart Set of Great Britain. In her coming conflict Mrs. Gould will have the weight of her husband's thirty-seven millions at her back.

Mrs. Gould was formerly Miss Edith Kelley, the beautiful "Pensacola Girl," who made such a hit in "Havanna" four years ago. Later she was known as the prettiest chorus girl at the famous Gaiety Theatre, London. She was married to the youngest son of the late Jay Gould shortly after his divorce from his first wife, Helen Kelly Gould.

And now a farmer she would be! But for a reason. From the bright life of the Gaiety stage, from the brighter life of Paris, this beautiful queen of jewels intends to get back to the farm and plough her way into the heart of London society. She will make her attack by way of a charming old castle in Ireland, a castle very near Kilmore Castle, the seat of the Duke of Manchester. She hopes to be aided by the Duchesse, who was an American herself.

The second Mrs. Gould has been married sixteen months. In this short time she has run the gamut of human pleasures. She has had everything that wealth could buy. Her adoring husband has snowed her under with pearls, diamonds, jewels of every kind. In London and Paris she is known as the Jewel Queen. Her collection of pearls, completed last Christmas, is valued at more than a million dollars. And from the collecting of pearls she would now devote herself to the raising of aristocratic sheep and pigs. For the one thing that her husband's wealth cannot buy has been friendship with her husband's family, and through them social recognition in New York.

A few months ago, when the George Goulds and Mrs. Tony Drexel were stopping at the Carlton Hotel, in London, the Frank Goulds made a last effort to be received by them. But Mrs. George Gould most openly snubbed them, and her example was followed by her whole family. Then the adoring husband said: "Never mind, dear. I will buy you anything you want. Do you want more pearls? Do you want a palace or two? Just tell me."

Mrs. Gould is as clever as she is pretty. She put on her thinking cap and said: "Buy me a castle in Ireland. I love that land of beauty. I am tired of New York's crudeness, of Paris' falseness, of London's smugness. Buy me a castle in Ireland."

No sooner said than done. The Goulds journeyed by motor through the loveliest parts of Ireland. Near Kilmore Castle, the magnificent estate belonging to the Duke of Manchester, they found a delightful, many towered, ivy-covered castle. It had hundreds of acres of woods and meadows; it had flower gardens, brave oaks and turf thick as velvet. It seemed a fairy palace, and it was on the market.

Before many days Mr. Gould succeeded in leasing the fairy castle. He wanted to try it for a year before purchasing it. Now Mrs. Gould is deep in plans for playing lady of the manor. She will be no absentee landlady! No farmer by proxy!

She will live at Castle Brachmore the greater part of the year. She will give dances and garden parties for the people of the "country," for the tenants and for the families of the high officials. This will be her pleasure. Her serious purpose will be to enter English society and perhaps marry her beautiful sister Hetty to some British nobleman.

Will Mrs. Gould, whose previous life has been the most exciting, be content with going "back to the farm," even with her important ends in view? She is planning the most wonderful flower and vegetable gardens. Will flowers and vegetables take the place of gay dinner parties at the Carlton? Will days on the meadows be as satisfying as glorious days spent at the French races?

Mrs. Gould is inclined to think "yes."

In America Mr. Gould is by way of being a railroad king. He has more than thirty millions, owns a vast estate in the South, a handsome house on Fifth avenue and an estate on Long Island. But, having been so cruelly snubbed by the Goulds and New York society, Mrs. Gould will not live in this country. The wonders of the Irish country appeal to her bee-eating soul, and the advantage of having an American-born duchess as a next door neighbor helps some.

The Duchesse is also interested in the culture of pigs. The Kilmore pigs have won many prizes at the county fairs. And Mrs. Gould cleverly counts on winning the Duchesse's friendship through her pigs.

Every one of the Gould pigs is to have a name, its own little pen, its gold collar and bath attendant. Mrs. Gould and her pretty sister Hetty will be the mistresses of a wide domain. They intend to superintend the raising of three eugenically bred pigs. And Mrs. Gould is absolutely sure that at the beginning of the next London season she will have made a definite impression on its most fashionable society.

THE GREATEST LIVING EDUCATORS

A WORKING newspaper man, Harris M. Crist, wants to know "Who are five living American educators worthy of special commendation?"

"For what should each be commended?" "Your judgment is asked by several of our school people."

It is easy to pick out five great educators and it is not necessary to have a school teacher or a college professor among the five—although, luckily for this country, we have many of the best teachers in the world in our schools and colleges. Just now we should select as educator No. 1 Miss Jane Addams of Chicago. She is a splendid education in herself and a living educational rebuke to those that oppose female suffrage.

When you consider that the State of Illinois possesses two individuals, one named Lorimer, and the other Jane Addams, that the State of Illinois allows Mr. Lorimer to vote and share in the making of laws, and refuses to give this privilege to Jane Addams, you begin to realize that the country needs the kind of education that Jane Addams can give it.

She is an educator in many other lines. But she is most valuable as a living educating proof of the fact that women, generally speaking, are better than men, and that opposition to female suffrage, and doubt of woman's intelligence and capacity, belong to the age of barbarism.

Educator No. 2 would be the first woman you meet in the street carrying a huge load, washing or sewing, or other evidence of hard work. When you look at that woman's face, especially if she is old, and see written in it so much of the world's burden and care and sorrow and anxiety, you have—if you can read it—an excellent volume full of education.

You see how much of our national law-makers' talk is devoted to triviality, how far we are from realizing the real problems and the real needs of the world. The woman you see perhaps is an old grandmother, thinking only of those younger, working for them, spending her days at labor and her nights caring for some sick child—AND NEVER COMPLAINING.

In every face of a poor, hard working old woman there is an education—and an education that the world needs.

Educator No. 3 is such a man as Professor Michelson, of the University of Chicago. He is the world's greatest authority on physics. His calculations amended and corrected man's knowledge of the speed of light and thus gave to human beings a yardstick for the measurement of cosmic distances.

He has done a great deal for knowledge, but

"The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth His handiwork.

"Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge."—Psalm 19, Verse 1.

THE WAY IN WHICH HE WORKS is greater as an educational force than the work he does.

He and men like him are thinking quietly, conservatively, doubting at every step, always making sure before they announce a result, always insisting that the questioner shall first KNOW WHAT HE ASKS.

Such men are putting human beings on a sure footing of knowledge, and giving to humanity actual information instead of the chaotic speculation of the philosophers, so called. Men like Michelson give to the race that will follow a basis upon which real and beautiful works of intellect and of the imagination may be erected.

When you ask Professor Michelson, for instance, "Can you conceive of consciousness without thought and individual personality?" he asks you with a smile, "What do you mean by thought, by consciousness and by individuality?"

If you can answer the question that answers your question, you get the answer that you ask for—although it is apt to be one that you little had in mind.

Such men as Michelson, who use in every thought and effort toward knowledge Voltaire's famous command, "Définissez nos termes," are men who with words and facts clearly defined are the educators of the human intellect.

Educator No. 4 is the first soldier that you meet strutting on his sentry post, with sword, gun and brass buttons.

This fighting educator teaches you that as the animal kingdom retains almost all that it has had in the past, from the single cell of life in the ocean depths to the highly developed "primate" living with his family in a flat, so the human race has retained all of its qualities, from the single primitive quality of hate and combat which the soldier represents to the highest quality represented by thought.

And this strutting soldier is an educator, as he impresses upon your mind the fact that we are civilized only in name, and that the highest races of the world, dividing the earth's power among them, depend for their rule and their permanency upon that triangular bayonet that opens a man's stomach with a wound that will not heal.

And you are surrounded by this soldier, with his fine uniform, with the band of music that walks before him on parade, with the cheers that greet him when he sets out to fight, that savage civilization, like the other savagery daubed with paint, reserves its best rewards, its glory, its monuments, its glowing pages of history for those that work at the inspiring task of disemboweling their fellow creatures, taking from the weak to give to the strong.

A soldier on his post, a battleship squandering in stupid salutes money that would build homes for a hundred workers—they are great educators, impressing upon our barbarous lack of civilization and our brutal stupidity.

The fifth and last educator whose name you ask is the first half-clothed baby that you see rolling in the gutter of a filthy street in a great city.

Look at that child and get an education in modern conditions.

You see the baker's boy passing the child, and under the arm of the boy, in a CLEAN basket, there are loaves of bread wrapped up in tissue paper to keep them from the dust. They are on their way to the table of a prosperous citizen.

You see the rich man walk by with his trousers turned up, or the rich woman pass with her skirt held high in her dainty hand. The cart rumbles along and scatters more dirt in the face of the child condemned to life on the sidewalk and in the gutter.

You hear a fool say, "How wonderful it is that the children of the poor survive—probably the dirt is good for them." But YOU know that the child you see surviving is one of the four, and the other three are dead—POISONED AND MURDERED BY CIVILIZATION.

This baby is an educator, if you see him intelligently, for in a land where all the power of the Government is used just at present backing no "Pure Food Laws" there is no Government interest in the child that wallows in filth because poverty condemns its mother to a vile and dirty neighborhood.

That child is an education, because it looks up at you with a smile, happy, free from complaint; a smile that reflects a glory that men shall realize on earth in a distant future.

One crawling baby, standing up as well as it can on its knees and its little hands, and fighting against a world too brutal to understand that it ought to care for it, is a great educator.

There you have five important public educators—and it is easy to name five thousand more. Every blade of grass that you see growing in the Spring, every bird flying with the straw that is to build a home, every shrill frog telling of nature's fertility, and every pounding engine telling of man's genius is an educator.

OH in one corner of the sky you see a mass of tiny stars, the Pleiades. And you know that there are thousands of suns in that little group. And at your feet you see a ball of dried grass that has life within it. You open it and see young field mice, with an angry mother protecting them. And you know that the same law, justice and unchanging rule governing that nest of stars above your head GOVERNS THE NEST OF MICE AT YOUR FEET. AND THAT IS AN EDUCATION.

A great and beautiful educator is the school teacher, the woman giving to the children of other women the love and the care that enables their minds to grow and absorb the truth.

And a beautiful and wonderful educator is the mother in her home, the mother whose days and minutes and thoughts are with the child that she has produced.

Hear the mother say over and over again, a thousand times, to the baby whose feeble eyes and wailing head are turned in her direction: "Yes, dear, yes, baby, yes, yes, yes."

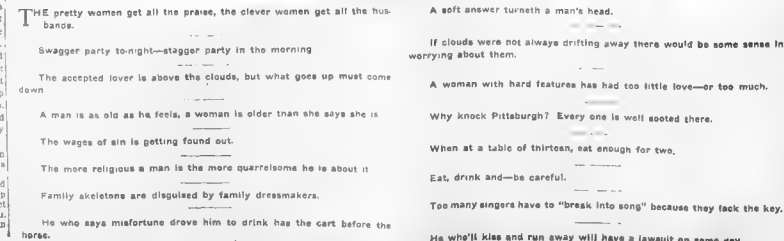

Study in any mother with her child the wonderful affection that has made progress on this earth possible, and that will bring perfection to this earth—there is an education in the wonderful power of nature's laws, lifting us up in spite of ourselves.

For the greatest educator of all, that which was before our speck of earth existed, and that which will be under other forms millions and millions of eternities in the future, look at the sun sinking in the West, and see the great inhabitants of space as they appear, silent and mysterious, in the dark sky of night.

That setting sun with its beauty of color, those stars with their power and glory, are educators. They teach you that the power and the justice back of them, the eternal law that has held them in their courses, and that has held and directed millions upon millions of suns and planets before them, does not intend that even this little earth shall remain inharmous, cruel and unworthy of its place in the great brotherhood of the stars.

You can learn from eternal wisdom and justice written in the heavens that harmony and happiness are our destiny. The sky at night is our greatest teacher.

No. 32—At a Studio Tea Helen Meets the "Poseurs" and the "Hangers-On"

By MABEL HERBERT URNER.

[illegible][illegible]

"Won't you make another sandwich?" asked the poet, who had helped himself liberally several times to one of these with the nuts.

Frier sister Helen had entered there before a crowd around the poet. The polite and rapid thin sandwiches and weak claret punch rapidly disappeared. She had heard that there was a certain poet, and she, who had lived mostly on what they got at tea, and now she saw several of them hungrily bolting the sandwiches. She was so com- pletely absorbed in the wonder if it could be true.

Some one announced that Mrs. Kathleen Burkhead would give some of her new poems. The poet, Mrs. Burkhead in spite of her looks and her girlish courtesy, looked fully thirty-five. The chairs were pulled back, and the poet, who was shared by the piano for the first time, stood.

With an affectionating tilt of her head, she put her hand to her forehead, and said, "How ridiculous, said before I heard 'The Olden Anne'." With her head held high on one side, by means of her mouth, and holding out her hand in front of her, she sang in her fourth in the way children are always impersonated but not child ever again.

She had had, I have heard, a

He also favoured them with "Tee gobblins" got to 'oo 'oo' don't watch
'em". After this Helen expected
"Little Blue Bird" but the applause was somewhat weak and they were spared that.

More Punch

And now there was another rush on the punch bowl. One needed a glass of something after these kind of things. Helen's reformance. Then the poet who sat beside Helen was easily persuaded to read one of his own poems. He always had a poem with him. And he always read it at some stage of the tea. Possibly he thought it "paying" for the enormous quantities of champagne and maccaroons that he devoured.

He took a Byronic attitude and in a resonant voice read
"Art thou the one I loved once?
Art thou?"

And no more the sphere the captives cherish!

Oh, who read one of our last part?

Then there where the joy thou as

as teacher eyes! Oh,
Oh,

thine? fondlest?

Thus and thus the celestial to know about us when our souls aspired?"

Then he had finished the lines of the poem, and he said, "I suppose that had been given the maiden. "How brilliant!" What ELEGANT thought! What delicious of telling! How truly poeti-cally!"

Then he read another sometimes mis-foretold and impossible, and he said, "I am sure less." It was plain that he expected to read still another, and some one rose to go, and, to his astonishment, the attention was diverted from him.

"Oh, don't you think it may be WONDERFUL to write poetry and to be a poet?"

"I am sure," said the man who had taken the poet's seat of the maggy couch beside him.

"I am sure," said some other man.

"And that is an attractive study!" I DO think studies are the most FASCINATING places in the world. I came over and learned almost anything the wall and she turned to him with her eyes admiration.

"I am sure," said one of Bradford, asked a man in a shabby yet terren cut, who was standing with a group just in front of Helen.

"I am sure," said another.

Deaky in view of the audience. Her primary task was to be Dr. Morton Prince's famous "Case of Sally," upon which actual record of dual personality the play is based. Dr. Prince's "Case of Sally" concerned a young woman who had been so severely shocked by the death of her father that she had split her mind, and her "bad" self by hypnotism. When David Ilesco produces a new play, access to the very bottom of things in the human mind is the theme of the play and this approach, which has made his productions distinctive, has been drilled into his players. Which explains Miss Starr's course when she found that Mr. Ilesco had selected her for the part of Sally. "I am not a mad woman," she said in the advice of Mr. Ilesco, explains Miss Starr, "one of the first things I did when I found that I was to play Deaky was to buy a copy of Lombroso's 'Donna Delinquenti' and read it through. It was a very interesting guide I made a thorough study of the young girls in our State reformatories. I had to do this, because Ilecky is what Lombroso calls a congenital criminal, and the only kind of criminal I had to play was a congenital criminal is in the institutions where they place incorrigible girls. In the various institutions I visited I became acquainted with the girls who were incorrigible. They were very much, not only because of the horror of them, but because it seemed to me that they were actually the victims of dual personalities, like my character in the play. I had to study the girls in the institutions for personality, and that only explained satisfactorily why so many of these girls had reached the condition they were in. Without exception I found that instead of coming from bad homes, they had had the most respectable antecedents. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, which I do as Deaky, that I have not seen in the girls in the institutions. I have seen the most incorrigible girl in some home of correction.

WITH the arrival of France Starr at the Hollibaugh in the Electric City, we shall have our first play of recent years showing an attractive young woman in a kind of Jekyll and Hyde role. In the play Mrs. Starr has a tale of dual personality, wherein she comes from the good Dorothy to the bad

VAUDEVILLE is breaking into the musical play side of the drama with more than usual emphasis. During this week at B. F. Keith's forty-five minutes of the musical drama, made up in three scenes will be presented. It is "The Changing Night," and is one of the most pretentious acts ever produced in the two-day-a-week homes. Just to show that vaudeville is not backward in supplying big productions, it is announced that the playlet has twenty-five comedians and a church choir—a somewhat startling combination.

An Abused Wife.

MARRIED DAUGHTER—Oh, dear! Such a time as I do have with that husband of mine! I don't have a minute's peace when he's in the house. He is always calling me to help do something or other.

Mother—What does he want now?

Daughter—He wants me to trample way on stairs just to thread a needle for him, so he can mend his clothes.

Maritime Punctuation.

PLUG—I understand the Panama Canal is going to cut the town of Colon in half.

Uggle—Then I suppose in the future the ships will pause at the semi-Colon.

Roll Away.

GERALD—Somebody took a roll of film from me to-day.

Geraldine—But you will have to pay them just the same, I suppose.

"Why?"

"The youngster came on the first of the month."

Bravery.

A STURDY Scotchman had been having a dispute with his wife, which resulted in his taking refuge under the bed. As she stood on guard with a golf-sized stick in her hand, he called lustily from his retreat:

"Ye can lamb me and ye can bate me, but ye canna break ma manly spirit. I'll na come out."

When?

"JUST one word of advice, son, before you go into the world."

"Yes, dad."

"Always be kind to Democrats. They have been torn now and then."

An Engagement.

THE hungry, shipwrecked seaman did not crumble at his fate:

He merely took a calendar and bit off a date.

Drowned!

BEARDED LADY—Did you hear of that terrible accident, Shorty?

Dwarf—No. What's the gloom?

Bearded Lady—The Human Shark was washing his hands and got so he drowned the waste pipe.

A Black Night.

SHIPPER—Did you ever hear of a look-out? No, it's a look-out for a thing.

What Every Woman Knows.

"I SHOULD like to open an account in the bank, if you please."

"We shall be glad to accommodate you, madam. What amount do you wish to deposit?"

"Oh, but I mean a checking account, such as I have at the big dry goods store."

Turnkeys.

KIND OLD LADY (pointing person)—Guard, who is that poor man with the beautiful hands in here? He looks like a great musician.

The False Gems

By Guy de Maupassant

MONSIEUR LANTIN had met the young girl at a reception at the house of the second head of his department, and had fallen head over heels in love with her.

She was the daughter of a provincial tax collector who had been dead several years. She and her mother came to live in Paris, where the latter, who made the acquaintance of some of the families in her neighborhood, hoped to find a husband for her daughter.

They had very moderate means, and were honorable, gentle and quiet.

The young girl was a perfect type of the virtuous woman in whose hands every sensible young man dreams of one day intrusting his happiness. Her simple beauty had the charm of angelic modesty, and the imperceptible smile which constantly hovered about the lips seemed to be the reflection of a pure and lovely soul. Her praises resounded on every side. People never tired of repeating: "Happy the man who wins her love! He could not find a better wife."

Monsieur Lantin, then chief clerk in the Department of the Interior, enjoyed a snug little salary of three thousand five hundred francs, and he proposed to this model young girl, and was accepted.

He was unexpectedly happy with her. She governed his household with such clever economy that they seemed to live in luxury. She lavished the most delicate attentions on her husband, caressed and fondled him, and so great was her charm that six years after their marriage Monsieur Lantin discovered that he loved his wife even more than during the first days of their honeymoon.

He found fault with only two of her tastes: her love for the theatre and her taste for imitation jewelry. Her friends (the wives of some petty officials) frequently procured for her a box at the theatre, often for the first representations of the new plays, and her husband was obliged to accompany her, whether he wished it or not, to these entertainments which bored him excessively after his day's work at the office.

After a time, Monsieur Lantin begged his wife to request some lady of her acquaintance to accompany her and to bring her home after the theatre. She opposed this arrangement at first, but after much persuasion consented, to the infinite delight of her husband.

Now with her love for the theatre came also the desire for ornaments. Her costumes remained as before, simple, in good taste and always modest; but she soon began to adorn her ears with huge rhinestones, which glittered and sparkled like real diamonds. Around her neck she wore strings of false pearls, on her arms bracelets of imitation gold and coming set with glass jewelry.

Her husband frequently remonstrated with her, saying: "My dear, as you cannot afford to buy real jewelry, you ought to appear adorned with your beauty and modesty alone, which are the rarest ornaments of your sex."

But she would smile sweetly, and say: "What can I do? I am so fond of jewelry. It is my only weakness. We cannot change our nature."

Then she would wind the pearl necklace round her fingers, make the facets of the crystal gems sparkle, and say: "Look! are they not lovely? One would swear they were real."

Monsieur Lantin would then answer, smilingly: "You have bohemian tastes, my dear."

Sometimes at an evening when they were enjoying a tete-a-tete by the fireside she would place on the tea table the morocco leather box containing the "trash," as Monsieur Lantin called it. She would examine the false gems with a passionate attention as though they imparted some deep and secret joy, and she often persisted in passing a necklace around her husband's neck and, laughing heartily, would exclaim: "How droll you look!" Then she would throw herself into his arms, and kiss him affectionately.

One evening in winter she had been to the opera and returned home chilled through and through. The next morning she coughed, and eight days later she died of inflammation of the lungs.

Monsieur Lantin's despair was so great that his hair became white in one month. He wept unceasingly, his heart was broken as he remembered her smile, her voice, every charm of his dead wife.

Time did not assuage his grief. Often, during office hours while his colleagues were discussing the topics of the day his eyes would suddenly fill with tears and he would give vent to his grief in heart-rending sobs. Everything in his wife's room remained as it was during her lifetime: all her furniture, even her clothing, being left as it was on the day of her death. Here he was wont to seclude himself daily and think of her who had been his treasure—the joy of his existence.

But his life soon became a struggle. His income, which in the hands of his wife covered all household expenses, was now no longer sufficient for his own immediate wants, and he wondered how she could have managed to buy such excellent wine and rare delicacies which he could no longer procure with his modest resources.

He incurred some debts, and was soon reduced to absolute poverty. One morning, finding himself without a cent in his pocket, he resolved to sell something, and immediately the thought occurred to him of disposing of his wife's paste jewels, for he cherished in his heart a sort of rancor against these "deceptions," which had always irritated him in the past.

"Monsieur Lantin, annoyed at these ceremonies, was on the point of saying: 'Oh, I know well enough it is not worth anything.'"

The very sight of them spoiled somewhat the memory of his lost darling.

To the last days of her life she had continued to make purchases, bringing home new gems almost every evening, and he turned them over some time before finally deciding to sell the heavy necklace, which she seemed to prefer, and which, he thought, ought to be worth about six or seven francs, for it was of very fine workmanship, though only imitation.

He put it in his pocket and started out in search of what seemed a reliable jeweler's shop. At length he found one and went in, feeling a little ashamed to expose his misery and also to offer such a worthless article for sale.

"Sir," said he to the merchant, "I would like to know what this is worth?"

The man took the necklace, examined it, called his clerk and made some remarks in an undertone; he then put the ornament back on the counter and looked at it from a distance to judge of the effect.

Monsieur Lantin, annoyed at all these ceremonies, was on the point of saying: "Oh, I know well enough it is not worth anything," when the jeweler said: "Sir, that necklace is worth from twelve to fifteen thousand francs, but I could not buy it unless you can tell me exactly where it came from."

The widower opened his eyes wide and remained gaping, not comprehending the merchant's meaning. Finally he stammered: "You say—are you sure?" The other replied, dryly: "You can try elsewhere and see if any one will offer you more. I consider it worth fifteen thousand at the most. Come back here if you cannot do better."

Monsieur Lantin, beside himself with astonishment, took up the necklace and left the store. He wished time for reflection.

Once outside, he felt inclined to laugh, and said to himself: "The fool! Oh, the fool! Had I only taken him at his word! That jeweler cannot distinguish real diamonds from the imitation article."

A few minutes after he entered another store in the Rue de la Paix. As soon as the proprietor glanced at the necklace he cried out:

"Ah, parbleu! I know it well; it was bought here."

Monsieur Lantin, greatly disturbed, asked: "How much is it worth?"

"Well, I sold it for twenty thousand francs. I am willing to take it back for eighteen thousand, when you inform me, according to our legal formality, how it came to be in your possession."

This time, Monsieur Lantin was dumfounded. He replied:

"But—examine it well. Until this moment I was under the impression that it was imitation."

The jeweler asked:

"What is your name, sir?"

"Lantin—I am in the employ of the Minister of the Interior. The merchant looked through his books, found the entry and said: "That necklace was sent to Madame Interior. I live at No. 10 Rue des Martyrs."

Lantin's address, No. 10 Rue des Martyrs, July 20, 1876."

The two men looked into each other's eyes; the widower speechless with astonishment, the jeweler scenting a thief. The latter broke the silence.

"Will you leave this necklace here for twenty-four hours?" said he; "I will give you a receipt."

Monsieur Lantin answered hastily: "Yes, certainly." Then, putting the ticket in his pocket, he left the store.

He wandered aimlessly through the streets, his mind in a state of dreadful confusion. He tried to reason, to understand. His wife could not afford to purchase such a costly ornament. Certainly not. But, then, it must have been a present—a present—a present from whom? Why was it given her?

He stopped and remained standing in the middle of the street. A horrible doubt entered his mind—she? Then all the other jewels must have been presents, too! The earth seemed to tremble beneath him—the tree before him to be falling; he threw up his arms and fell to the ground, unconscious. He recovered his senses in a pharmacy into which the passers-by had borne him. He asked to be taken home, and when he reached the house he shut himself up in his room and wept until midnight. Finally, overcome with fatigue, he went to bed and fell into a heavy sleep.

The sun awoke him next morning and he began to dress slowly to go to the office. It was hard to work after such checks. He sent a letter to his employer, requesting to be excused. Then he remembered that he had to return to the jeweler's. He did not like the idea, but he could not leave

The Witch of Crocodile Creek--By J. F. Dwyer

It the Almighty ever made an uglier spot than Crocodile Creek on the southwest coast of New Guinea, that spot hasn't been discovered yet. Body of me, no! Crocodile Creek would have served as an annex to Tophet and I'll wager that any lost souls transferred from headquarters would have grumbled at the change. It is the original haunt of the loco bug, the real ten-strike among tough quarters, and the way the silence creeps itself into that place makes you think that the trees have sighted something creepy crawling their way and that they are just gasping at the thought of being wiped out of existence. As a sanctuary for parasites it has all other spots topped to the hilt. The cripple that wouldn't grab his bunk and reach out for the horizon the first day he landed in that spot could look himself up as a hopeless case, and he could give the glacial mitt to any sawbones who thought he could tinker up his penumbrating machinery.

Captain Jack Cameron felt the snaky influence of that darned place. We put in there after water and we were in a mighty hurry to get out, but something stopped me. I wasn't had picked up a foot Englishman at Karesoa, the little government station on the Gulf of Papua, and while we were stowing water into the Coral Queen that Cockney lookered went ashore and lost himself. He was a comfiance man that his friends had sent out to the rim of the earth in the hope that he'd fall over the edge, and he hadn't as much gray matter in his head as would fill a tailor's thumb. He had been an ordinary guy I think, but he wouldn't have left him there, not a fool could always get a big squeeze of Cameron's compassion bag, so when he didn't turn up on the second day we went ashore to look for him in that confounded, nag-looking land of mangrove, dipodops, lured and canny wood that grew right down to the water and piled itself up like a green barricade as if it wanted to keep the waves of the Coral Sea from seeing what was behind. The damned creepies crawled all over the tree masses like live things and the moss hung from the limbs of Rip Van Winkle's ghost every time one of those queer puffs of wind that the Maoris call "a devil's sneeze" set the tuffs seeping backward and forward. "Sparks a duffer! Won't it be a world spot?"

"It's only an unimaginative idiot from White-chapel that would tiddle into this scenery," growled Cameron, when he made a landing on the slinky shore. "This little place has got the worst spots on Malidocia hiding in the drapings."

"Captain Jack was right. We were used to silent places, but that creek had a brand of silence that we hadn't dreamed of. When a crocodile flopped on a mudbank and welshed the water with his tail the noise made every one of us hop up like the pumping Kyles, and Murphy muttered one of the little prayers that he reckoned would start all breeds of fairies and evilwines on a Marathon. If they were within hearing distance.

"Faith, this place looks as if it was bewitched," he muttered. "There was a folk book of an mother's place in Croaghnaulla in the County Wexford where the fairies used to gather at night, and it was there--"

"Shut up!" snapped Cameron. "If you stick your big toe into the eye of a crocodile while you're poking round in that mud you'll never see your precious Croaghnaulla again. Pull the boat up into the mangrove clump and hand me that Winchester."

The fool Bridgish's name was Lanford-Percy Duddington Lanford, no less, and we put a few curses on Percy's brain garage during the next hour. Peasants and peppercones! Didn't we einst Captain Jack found the prints of bare feet in the mud about a mile up the creek and we started in the direction that the toes pointed in, piling curses on the Britisher all the way.

"But what has he done with his shoes?" "P'raps he's trying to harden his feet now that he finds that he can't harden his brain. But how the devil a lunthead like him could get through this vegetation beats me."

It beat us, too. That infernal growth was that thick that we had to get down on our hands and knees to crawl, and crawling in a Papuan jungle isn't a game that you'd take up for amusement. The tropics breed too many varieties of insects that are ready to bite if you only look in their direction, and the thorns in that place would prick holes through steel armor. The loneliness had our spinal columns in cold storage, and we felt real sweet to find that fool Cockney as we did the worst stunt. You bet we did! We carried more than points to the square inch than a full grown porcupine carries quills, but the blamed prickly larks were always finding fresh spots to dig their spines into, and we cursed outrageously.

Captain Jack was breaking trail for us, and we guessed the kind of feeling that Cameron had for Percy Duddington. He didn't say anything, but the way he sneaked back those snaky creepers told us that he had a lot of spleen under the hatches. Cameron had a way of letting it out through his hands instead of his tongue, and we guessed things.

I guess we must have covered a couple of miles though, but deathly growth before Captain Jack pulled up suddenly and lifted his hand as a signal for us to keep silence. We weren't doing much talking at the moment--that place sort of bobbed your tongue when you were crawling through it--but the few words we were manufacturing were shut off mighty quick when Cameron signalled. That was an atmosphere that you expected anything to happen in, and we sneaked quietly up alongside Captain Jack and peered through the flaming network of thorny creepers.

We forgot that we were walking those cushions when we took that first peep. Shades of Pharaoh's Army! yes! That glimpse through the jungle of a garden and larger vines that clung to us like leeches took our breath. Right in front of us was a cleared patch, in the middle of which was a white-palm shack, and in front of the shack was a sight that whisked us back on the astonishment bump. Standing in the middle of the little cleared space, where a sunbeam that stabbed its way through the moist green foliage fell upon her head, was a white woman, and a few feet in front of her bare feet were three big snakes of a conical red tint that were unrolling themselves in an effort to stand on their darned tails as she lifted her finger slowly up!

Every muscle on our bodies seemed to turn to stone as we watched the woman. The performance looked mighty meany to us. You'd just as soon think of finding a rhinoceros in a Harlem that as of finding a white woman in the southeast quarter of New Guinea, and we wondered for a few seconds if the heat and the loneliness had thrown our thinking apparatus out of order. But she was there all right. And the snakes were there, too! Three of 'em, all about the same size, with nasty flat heads and a color like a boiled lobster.

Murphy gave a little gurgle that made us think he was going to invoke the aid of St. Patrick, but Captain Jack glared at him, and he cut the gurgle off in the middle and stowed the undelivered part away till some time when Cameron's eye wasn't on him. We didn't blame Murphy. Only our tongues were too dry to make a sound we would have tried to jerk our astonishment into the atmosphere, too. Roberts and bandicoots! Yes! The sight of that white woman putting a bunch of snakes through circus stunts knocked us sideways.

She was a lean, tall woman, her face tanned a nice sort of brown, and she was dressed in a long loose skirt made out of bark cloth like the stuff the Harrowas make their chawats out of, but her feet were bare, and the moment we saw that her feet were bare we knew that it was her trail that we had been following from the creek.

The snakes stood up on their tails after a lot of struggling; then the woman started to chant something in a jargon that was a mixture of Hindustani and Malay, and those darned creepy insects commenced to move their heads from side to side. The woman moved backward slowly, and the trinity of wrigglers started to waddle after her round and round the square. It was about one hundred and eight in the shade in that blasted jungle, but when she went by us with the three snakes keeping the about two feet in the rear, we thought the temperature had dropped to zero. The way the little wicked eyes of that trio watched her hand as if awaiting instructions made us colder than a polar bear on an ice floe, and when she came round on the second circle we were ready to hit the back trail. The thing had upset us. First of all we didn't think that we were within a sound mile of a white woman, and, secondly, we didn't think if there was one in the neighborhood that she could make three red snakes march around a rig like blamed grenadiers! No, sir! Not a single man in our batch was digging in his thought strata for anything like that when we struck my ladyship putting her wrigglers through their daily stunt!

She was doing the third lap around the clearing when Mr. Coincidence thought it time to stretch out that long arm that the novelists tell us about. One of the blamed snakes got started at something, and he pulled up in the middle of the ring. "Come along, Pluto," says the charmer. "Come along, now!"

But Pluto jabbed his brake down hard, and he wouldn't budge an inch. The woman hosed him with a wide dictionary of out-of-the-way words, but he just snapped carelessly at blueblotch flies till it got her mad. She rushed at him with a little swell, and I'm hanged if Pluto didn't turn tail and bolt directly toward the spot where Murphy was crouched behind the creepers!

Caesar's Ghost! didn't Murphy give a yell! It must have traveled up to Fort Moresby without exhausting in sound volume. Gee! it was a scream! It frightened the old snake that much that he pulled up on quick and wriggled back to his two mates, and while the woman was staring at the spot where the yell came from, Captain Jack pushed aside the bushes and made a bow that put all Claude Duval's spinal twists into the shadow patches. Cameron could give a man a war captain twenty points in a hundred in an etiquette game and beat him with a bunch of fritt in hand.

"I hope we didn't startle you," he said politely. "One of my men yelled when he saw the snake coming at him. We're hunting for a silly lunthead that's gone and lost himself in the jungle, and when we spotted you making the snakes do the march past we just naturally stopped to look at them."

The woman wasn't young nor she wasn't pretty, but she had a face that you wouldn't forget in a hurry. It was a dial that told you that the owner of it could look after herself, and we didn't doubt it after we had seen her playing doll instructor to the snaky trinity. She looked at Cameron for a few minutes; then she started to laugh, and when we saw her smile we came out of the creepers and lined up alongside Cameron. Murphy keeping his eyes on the three old crawlers as if he expected them to make a rush at him at any minute.

She surveyed us coolly with her big amber-colored eyes, and we thought she was looking through us at the palm trees. "Which one gave that yell?" she asked.

"This man," said Cameron, pointing to Murphy. "He's afraid of snakes."

"But my snakes won't hurt him," she said. "My snakes are the gentlest creatures in the Malay Archipelago." She turned round to the three and lifted up her hand. "Here, Pluto," she cried, and then she started to reel off the jargon that she was flooding the place with when first we saw her.

The biggest snake of the three got up on his tail and started toward Murphy, bobbing his old flat head as he came, but Murphy wasn't taking any countenance from a snake. Not much! He reached for a piece of blackwood that was near his hand, and the snake did a backstep that would make Kid Macey open his eyes.

"He won't hurt you," she said sweetly. "He wants to how to you."

"If it's all the same to you, ma'am," stammered Murphy, "I'd rather not be on speaking terms with the necklace with that man. He dressed and went out.

It was a lovely day, a clear, blue sky smiled on the busy city below. Men of leisure were strolling about with their hands in their pockets.

Monsieur Lantin, observing them, said to himself: "The rich, indeed, are happy. With money it is possible to forget even the deepest sorrow. One can go where one pleases and in travel find that distraction which is the surest cure for grief. Oh! if I were only rich!"

He perceived that he was hungry, but his pocket was empty. He again considered the necklace. Fifteen thousand francs! Eighteen thousand francs! What a sum!

He soon arrived in the Rue de la Paix, opposite the Jeweler's. Eighteen thousand francs! Twenty times he resolved to go in, but shame kept him back. He was hungry, however--very hungry--and not a cent in his pocket. He decided quickly, ran across the street in order not to have time for reflection and rushed into the store.

The proprietor immediately came forward and politely offered him a chair, the clerks glanced at him knowingly.

"I have made mistakes, Monsieur Lantin," said the Jeweler, "and if you are still resolved to dispose of the gem, I am ready to pay you the price I offered."

"Certainly, sir," stammered Monsieur Lantin. Whereupon the proprietor took from a drawer eighteen large bills, counted and handed them to Monsieur Lantin, who signed a receipt, and with trembling hand put the money into his pocket.

As he was about to leave the store, he turned toward the merchant, who still wore the same smile, and lowering his eyes, said:

"I have--I have other gems which came from the same source. Will you buy them also?"

The merchant bowed. "Certainly, sir."

Monsieur Lantin said gravely: "I will bring them to you." An hour later he returned with the gems.

The large diamond earrings were worth twenty thousand francs, the bracelets thirty-five thousand, the rings sixteen thousand, a set of emeralds and sapphires fourteen thousand, a gold chain with solitary pendant forty thousand--making the sum of one hundred and forty-three thousand francs.

The Jeweler remarked jokingly:

"There was a person who invested all her savings in precious stones."

Monsieur Lantin replied seriously:

"It is only another way of investing one's money."

That day he lunched at Volain's and drank wine worth twenty francs a bottle. Then he hired a carriage and made a tour of the Bois. He gazed at the various fountains with a kind of disdain, and could hardly refrain from crying out to the occupants:

"I, too, am rich! I am worth two hundred thousand francs!"

Suddenly he thought of his employer. He drove up to the bureau, and entered gaily, saying:

"Sir, I have come to resign my position. I have just inherited three hundred thousand francs."

He shook hands with his former colleagues and confided to them some of his projects for the future; he then went off to dine at the Cafe Anglaise.

He seated himself beside a gentleman of aristocratic bearing, and, during the meal, informed the latter confidentially that he had just inherited a fortune of four hundred thousand francs.

For the first time in his life he was not bored at the theatre and spent the remainder of the night in a gay frolic.

Six months afterward he married again. His second wife was a very good woman, but had a violent temper. She caused him much sorrow.

him. I'm Irish, and the Irish, as you might have heard, don't take kindly to snakes. The blessed St. Patrick cleared them out of Ireland years before the English, had luck to them, ever got a grip of the place."

The woman started to laugh again, and the three snakes curled themselves up and watched Murphy, and Murphy watched the snakes and the lump of black wood.

"The woman stopped laughing at last, then she started to fire questions at Cameron.

"Have you a boat?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am, the schooner Coral Queen," said Captain Jack. "She's anchored just outside the creek."

"And what did you say you were looking for?" she questioned.

"A 'Inchbush,' said Cameron, pulling a few thorns out of his legs as he answered the questions. "The fool went ashore yesterday and hasn't turned up. We saw your tracks at the head of the creek, and we thought they were his, and that was damned foolish of us. We might have known that he didn't have a foot as small as that."

The woman smiled as if she liked the compliment, but she tucked her toes under the bar-cloth skirt and looked up at the hills that showed like a band of purple away off behind the palm trees.

"I guess the Kukukukus have grabbed him," she said slowly. "That's about the most likely conclusion."

Now, we hadn't thought about the Kukukukus when we were hunting for Lanford. We didn't think that those little sawed-off, man-eating devils were so close to us, and when the snake charmer mentioned them you can bet we started wondering if the fool Britisher had been hauled up for supper on the evening previous. The Kukukukus are the dearest little devils for their inches on this old dustheap, and human flesh is one of the biggest draws on their menu cards. Body o' me! yes! They'd walk a man through a flock of turkeys, and they'd never look at the gobblers. Not a look. There's no modesty about a Kukukuku. Not an ounce of it. The Boston Missionary Association hasn't clinched with him yet, and he isn't a bit ashamed of his appetite. Human flesh to him is a bigger attraction than pie to a starving hobo, and he doesn't blush when any one pokes a finger at him.

"Why," said Cameron, "he wouldn't have been such a mutt as to go up into the mountains! He was a tenderfoot, a jackeroo, you know, a regular greeny."

"He could have met them without going up into the mountains," said the woman. "I saw a dozen of them on the other side of the creek yesterday."

We looked at her when she said that. It seemed mighty cool of her to talk about Kukukukus making a fiasco of Lanford while she was playing with three snakes a few miles away.

"But what about you?" spluttered Cameron. "Aren't you afraid?"

The snake charmer laughed. "Not a little bit," she said.

"Is your husband here?" asked Captain Jack.

"No," she answered. "My husband died nine years ago. I have been living here alone since then."

Cameron took a good mouthful of air, and we gasped some to keep him company. "But the cannibals!" cried Captain Jack. "Don't they come near you?"

The woman flicked Plato, the big snake, with a little switch that she was carrying, and he pulled back the head that he was reaching out in the direction of Murphy. "The cannibals keep clear of me," she said quietly. "I've made a little reputation amongst them. They call me the Witch of Crocodile Creek."

We stood and stared at her then. Down in this little kennels at Fort Moresby we had heard a tale or two about the Witch of Crocodile Creek, but they were so blamed thick that we had let them go in one ear and out the other. Now when we saw her in front of our eyes we rubbeded like a yap from Big Hat when he strikes the Metropolitan tower.

It was the woman that stopped the stare at last. She grabbed two of the snakes, coiled them into a neat ball and stowed them away in a bag that she had tied around her waist. Then she coiled Plato, and hung him over her arm like a coil of rope.

"When did he leave the boat?" she asked.

"Yesterday morning," answered Captain Jack. "and we haven't seen a trace of him since."

"If the Kukukukus have got hold of him," said the witch woman, "and I'm pretty near sure that they have, you'd better be hunting. They seldom bother about fattening up their prisoners if the feeder is empty, and I shouldn't wonder if they were not digesting him by this."

We didn't feel like when she said that. That place had the same effect upon us as a big drink of Banjeramasia rum, and she spoke coolly about those little human bonnets making a pet of Percy Duddington. It gave us a squally feeling to the stomachs. Yes, sir! That infernal jungle was a mighty chilly proposition of its own, and when it was coupled up with a woman with three lobster-colored snakes, and a bunch of man-eating Niggers, it was a lump of scenery that made our blood so cold that it couldn't race around our system.

"If you could tell us anything about them," said Cameron, "we'd see whether their digestive organs would assimilate a few rounds of soft-soled bullets."

The woman looked Captain Jack over with a keen eye when he said that, and then she smiled as if she liked his appearance. "They're vicious," she said. "It would be a risky game to call upon them unless you had an invitation."

Cameron blushed as if he thought she had insinuated that he wasn't game for the job. "We're rather careless about risks," he spluttered. "If you could give us any information about them we'd be thankful."

The woman looked at Plato, who was watching Murphy with his little wicked eyes, then she glanced at the hills where the creepers hung like green shawls over the tree tops. "I think I'll go with you," she said. "These little fuzzy-headed scorpions are rather afraid of me, and I might manage to get back your silly shipmate without a fight."

She turned to the other side of the clearing and we followed in single file. Somehow she made us feel that she was a mighty big proposition at that minute. It would have tried the nerve of any one of us to stay in that jungle for twenty-four hours without a companion, and when we found that she had camped there nine years or her long hair it made us change our opinion about femininity in general.

There was another path at the other side of the clearing, and we started off in the direction of the hills, the witch woman leading. Cameron next, then Mackey, Steele and I, while Murphy brought up the rear.

"Faith, I want to keep as far away from that old devil of a snake as I can," he muttered, so we started to burrow into the thick growth that blocked the way. "It's meself that thinks she is a fairy. No woman of flesh and blood would be juggling with three fast-tailed vermin like she is doing."

But the snake charmer proved that she was flesh and blood during the next four hours. Gee! yes!

"Standing in the middle of the little cleared space was a white woman, and within a few feet of her bare toes were three big snakes."

The way she went through that infernal jungle put us on our mettle. Shades of Cesare! wasn't she a walker! She slithered through that place like a ferret, and we were tired out before she had covered half the distance to the point which she told Captain Jack was the headquarters of the glidy Kukukukus.

"I know they have grabbed him," she said, when Cameron hinted that we might be on a wrong scent. "There were signals this morning that told me plainly they had gathered in something."

Cameron nodded. He had no breath to waste in arguing the point, and she patterned along in her bare feet with that big snake hanging over her arm and making faces at us as he reeled his head from side to side. Every time we went round a bend so that he could get a glimpse of Murphy in the rear, the seegar would poke out his tongue, and Murphy cursed him in Gaelic, and that's the best language in the world for cursing anything in. Murphy, being Irish, hadn't much love for Englishmen at any time, and when it came to hooking up with a woman and three snakes to make a rescue party for one, he reckoned it would be a good idea to let the Britisher fade away in a stew and forget about him. Of course, it was only his hatred of snakes that made him say that, so we took no notice.

Night snaked down from Asia and flapped down on us like a wet blanket. It got that infernal dark that we had to put our hands on each other's shoulders, but the woman kept going full speed. Hobbits and badniks! wasn't it dark! A lot of those plants felt moist and sweaty to the touch, and the pods of the bilberries went off like small six-pounders when we trod on them. Our nerves were in the blink proper.

"Have we got much farther to go?" asked Cameron, after we had done the old man Weston act over about twenty miles of country. "If we have I think it would be good business to camp here and do the rest of the tour tomorrow."

"Hush! whispered the woman. "We're nearly to the place."

She went a bit slower then, and it gave us a chance to get our breath. And it gave us an opportunity to listen to the sounds that were coming out of that big sprawling jungle. Spirits o' niter! yes! We were used to the sounds of clean wholesome waves plunking against the sides of the Coral Queen, but the little plops and pats that came out of that place were something that we didn't fancy. The sounds that jumped our wise accumulators didn't seem clean sounds. Do you understand? They were sneaky, creep rows that told us that only looking things were crawling round in that place, and we got the goose-flesh feeling mighty bad.

Presently a noise like the beating of a totem came swirling through the darkness, and the snake charmer halted on the brink and passed the signal along to us. Cameron sent us scurrying back to get down on our hands and knees and crawl, and the order nearly sent Murphy into convulsions. He thought that damned old snake might sneak away from that woman in the darkness and get to him, and I'll wager he was at spreading point during the twenty minutes we were using dyspeptic him. If any one challenged him, anything belonging to the snake tribe would make him scot for the bullberries by just looking in his direction.

The noise got louder as we crawled along. It surged up around us like booming laments of woe that went swirling over our heads into the jungle. And that noise had a color to us. It's a fact! When we listened we pictured it as a being purple, and it chilled our blood as we squatted there and heard it go over us like threads, boring into the dark night.

"It's a cross between the lappies and a Chinaman's harp, only there's more poison in it," whispered Murphy. "The bawls cry like that in Ireland when any one is going to die."

"You'll die sudden if you don't keep your mouth shut," growled Cameron. "You've got more to say than a Kling mother-in-law."

The woman crept slowly forward, and we crawled behind her at a three knot a day speed. The noise got louder and louder, and we got to the edge of seven different places as we snaked it in. It was the queerest noise we had ever heard, and the funny thing about it was that we thought we could feel it if we put our hands up and groped around in the atmosphere.

The snake woman stopped suddenly, and we made a backwater behind her like you see in Fifth Avenue when a mounted cop throws up his hand at Forty-second Street. She plopped so snugly quick that we sensed there was something wrong directly in front of us, and we sensed right. It took us half a minute to gather up the situation just because the infernal way of it sort of paralyzed our absorbing powers, but when we did grip it we felt as if some one had tied a knot in our spinal columns. "Cuckumbers and catnip! yes! She had pulled up on the edge of a small bowl in the middle of the hills, and we were all pop-eyed before you could say John Henry O'Connell! There was a fine smoke coming out of that place in clouds, and the clouds were that thick you couldn't see the opposite side of the bowl. The snake came up in puff-great blue puffs and in the same puff she fired the fires in the bottom of the bowl. It lit up the place, and we managed to get a glimpse of what was going on. Gevondillions! wasn't it a show! The bowl wasn't more than four feet across and ten feet deep, the sides being mostly bare rock, while the bottom was covered with moss and ferns, and we hung over the edge and rubbeded at full speed.

"Shades of Stonewall Jackson!" whispered Steele; "there's Percy Duddington! Look! Right in the centre of the ring!"

When we sighted the fool Britisher we seemed to get the key of the situation, it looked as if the whole show was revolving round Percy, but Percy was a stationary affair himself. My, yes! He was trussed up to a stunted palm tree in the middle of the clearing and five score Kukukukus were doing a death dance in his honor.

I don't know how the backing felt at that moment, but we incubated shivers at the rate of five a second. Percy was stripped to his chest protector—he always wore one that his aunt had constructed out of red flannel, and when we caught glimpses of him through the smoke he made us think of a pinched Thanksgiving turkey that's waiting for the choicest stuffing.

Cameron pushed the handle of his rifle through the creepers, but the snake woman grabbed his hand. "Don't," she whispered. "They won't have their feet till the moon comes up."

"And some of them won't be in the humor to eat it," snarled Cameron. "I don't mind them killing a man, but by the beard of Buddha, I object to them making a goulash of him!"

"There's plenty of them," murmured the woman. "Let me think it over."

She stretched herself full length on the edge of the bowl, and we located the exact spots that we could find nervy. It was certainly something of a sight. The gentle Kukukuku when he puts on his full dress uniform makes the comic page of a New York Sunday paper look quite respectable. He's the original Bad Dream that made him a better boy Turpins and bananas! Yes! It's got all the glidy stockings that Willie's yellow dog has been doing a fine dance with. His tail area is uglier than anything that has been worn since the glyptodon got tired of lying, but he isn't satisfied with it for state occasions. Not him! He crawls into mounds that he manufactures out of palm leaves daddled with lime and red ochre, and the five acres that were hopping round Percy Duddington were the biggest freshest that ever disturbed a landscape.

"What time does the moon come up?" asked Cameron, after we had watched them for about three minutes.

"In about an hour," answered the snake woman. "There's plenty time to rescue him."

The snake woman was right about the moon. Before an hour had gone by a glow started to come over the hills, and we could see things plainer in the bow. Great, those moon showers seemed to be mightily pleased that old moon was coming. They dancing around like madmen, and Cameron crossed as he rightened his belt. Steele sat up and worked a crank out of his arm, and Mackey pulled his hat down tight. Mackey had a horror of losing his hat in a scrimmage, and whenever he thought things were going to be extra warm, he'd give a good pull at his old brain shelter before going into battle.

"Well," said Cameron, turning to the snake lady, "if you haven't anything to propose, I think we'll make a start."

The witch didn't answer for a minute. She buzzed, the big snake, around her neck and pulled the two other snakes out of the bag that she had at her waist, then she stood up quickly and grabbed a banana vine that ran up the side of the bowl.

"If I'm not successful you can take a hand," she said quickly. "But don't move a muscle till you are certain that I am beat. If they see you I'll lose my life."

Cameron snatched at her skirt, but he was too late. She slid down the creeper like a sailor, and we gasped for breath as we watched her rush across the clearing with those three lobster-colored snakes trailing round her head as if she was giving an initiation of Mrs. Medusa. Mother of me! wasn't it a sight! Cameron had grinned at the view, intending to follow her, but Steele lunged on to him, and we watched the effect on the bunch of yelling devils that were mentally digesting Percy Duddington as they galloped round him.

Body of blazes! didn't she create a sensation! The moment she climbed into view you would have thought that they had sighted a three-headed thing that had been doing a fast stunt. It made us jump. When she struck the centre of the path she started to whirl round slowly in a sort of swoony dance, while Plato and his two mates pushed their flat heads at every little scandal that was within five yards of her.

It was mighty plain to us that the bunch had a big bank of respect for Ma Medusa. They backed away from her and her three flatheads like a bobo from a volcano, and the durned snakes seemed to be enjoying the fun. When a Kukukuku was slow in getting out of the way, that old Pluto would march out his head like a jack-in-the-box, and the wriggler seemed mightily pleased when the bigger screamed like a ferryboat in a fog.

You bet Percy Duddington didn't blink much while the act was on. Not him! His lower jaw got down on his chest, and his eyes climbed halfway out of their sockets when she skipped out of the shadow, and he didn't alter his expression for the next five minutes. That five minutes was a lively one. The snake charmer made the allotment look like Broadway on a New Year's eve. Gee! didn't it buzz! Pluto and his two relatives took a grip of her neck and waited themselves into the atmosphere like the longest feeders of an octopus, and you can wager your immortal soul against a bag of popcorn that the Kukukukus weren't in the way when they did the waltz stunts. Sufferin' sinners! not! She swept them back into one corner of the hollow, the fuzzyheaded heads moving like grasshoppers in a dry season, and we had a job to keep our whoops of encouragement under the hatches.

The lowest side of that bowl was just about ten yards from the spot where we were sitting, and the Kukukukus started full speed in that direction. Didn't they just gallop! They clawed up the sides with toes and hands, and we were just beginning to think that Mrs. Medusa had won the engagement in one round, when Plato executed a fine movement and landed in the chances. Murphy, shifting his position in the bunch of greenstuff on the edge of the bowl, happened to put his hand on a relative of the flatheaded snakes that the lady was joggling with, and the next we knew about Murphy he was somewhere, through the air onto the mob of man biters down below!

Holy St. Patrick! didn't that cause a commotion! The Nigs were so infernally peppery through being chased away from their supper by Ma Medusa that they fastened upon Murphy like ants to a craped snake, and the climax of that affair made a hole in the scenery in its hurry to get into place. I don't know how we got down alongside Murphy, but we got there quick, and then the fun started. Cameron on hand about him in such style that the Nigs crowded backward and knocked over the snake charmer and her three wrigglers, and when they got loose you can just bet that they pushed the joyful note of the affair up some. Yes, sir! What with the bunch of us whacking at every head that we could see, Ma Medusa screaming at the top of her voice, and the three wrigglers twisting themselves round the legs of the yelling cannibals, things were only slightly merry.

But the Nigs were game. I guess their appetites came back to them when we flopped down, and they guessed they'd do another serenade for their supper. Focus and peppercorn! didn't they charge! Cameron and Mackey opened up on them with the Winchester, while Steele and Murphy were doing big stunts at close quarters, and the witch woman got hold of Plato and went at 'em in the rear. It was something of a tight job then. The hills echoed with yells and screams, and the Nigs found that they were in a warm corner. You bet they did. Old Pluto, the big snake, was doing some good work just then. He was certainly something of a fighter when he could get close to his man, and the way he jerked out his head when a Kukukuku got within biting distance was a bit of an object lesson.

Mackey had seen the ropes from Percy Duddington when the cannibals started to retreat, and when the last fuzzyhead had scrambled up the bananas, the snake lady signalled that we had better be doing a backstep while we had the opportunity.

"They'll come back," she cried. "They'll come back a thousand strong. Follow us, I know a short cut back to the creek."

We didn't wait till we reached the head of the creek where we had planted the boat in the morning; and when we pulled up we saw that the snake woman was crying.

"What's up?" said Captain Jack. "What's the matter?"

"It's my snakes," she blubbered. "The other two, Marco and Caesar, got—got away from me in the serious-serious-scrammage."

We might rightly mean about it as we stood there and watched her weep. It was all over Percy Duddington that she lost the blamed reptiles, and Cameron got that mad that he gave the Britisher a kick to ease his temper.

"Don't cry," he said soothingly. "Forget all about the snakes and come aboard the schooner. We'll run you down to Port Moresby or any other old place that you like to name."

The woman shook her head and wiped the tears out of her eyes. "I wouldn't leave here," she stammered. "My husband, Professor Hubert Lyons, died here, and I couldn't live anywhere else."

We climbed into the boat and pushed off, and just then an idea struck Cameron. "Can I send you over some cloth in the morning?" he yelled. "Some cloth for dresses and things?"

"If you would," replied the woman. "And—and if you had such a thing as a bonnet. Have you? I haven't worn one for ten years, and I'd like to give these fuzzyheads a surprise."

We had quite a big stock of trade stuff on the hold of the "Coral Queen," and we carried a load of dress goods and ancient bonnets up the creek next morning, and we struggled through the jungle to the little shack where we had first seen the snake charmer nothing her trimly through the circus stunts.

It was mighty silent round there, but we burrowed through till we got to the door. There was no one in the place, but a piece of white bark with some writing on it was pinned to the door, and we laid down our bundles and studied the notice. It read:

"Leave the bundle inside. I've gone up into the hills to see if I can recover my two snakes."

I hope you have brought a bonnet.
